TAPESTRY

Dear Friends,

Thank you for being here with us tonight as we close out our 25th Anniversary performance season with Tapestry: The Music of Carole King and Friends.

This show feels like a quiet ending to a big year. Not quiet in importance, but in its nature. The music we're sharing tonight doesn't lean on volume or spectacle. It leans on something more personal. It asks the performer to step into the song and mean it.

That's what makes this material so powerful—and so challenging. There's no place to hide in it. The space between the notes matters just as much as the notes themselves. It requires patience, control, and a willingness to be honest in front of an audience.

That's where the real work happens for our students. Not just learning the parts, but learning how to listen, how to support each other, and how to bring something real to the stage. That's what we spend our time on in lessons and rehearsals, and that's what you're seeing tonight.

For our seniors, tonight carries a little more weight. This is their last time stepping onto this stage as students of the Collective. Some of them have been here for years, growing up in these rooms, learning what it means to commit to something, to work through difficulty, and to stand up and deliver when it matters. You can feel that in a performance like this. There's a depth that only comes with time.

As they move on, they take more than songs with them. They take the habits, the discipline, and the understanding that this kind of work leaves behind. That part stays.

Thank you for being here with us tonight for this special performance, and for the role you play in making moments like this possible.

Enjoy the show!
